What is the connection between violence and sports? Psychologists say that there are many reasons for violence at sporting events. One of the reasons for violence at sporting events is the crowd itself. When individuals are in a large group of people, watching sports games, they are likely to lose their sense of personal responsibility. Research shows that people in crowds do things that they would never do alone. People in crowds feel anonymous — no one knows who they are. Crowds also make people feel powerful. They stop making personal decisions. They just follow the crowd. Social psychologists call this a “mob psychology.”

The mounds act like dams to keep water out of the ants' underground homes. You can also look under the leaves on trees for butterflies. This is where they like to hide just before a storm.
